Concepts, Community and Collaboration

Writing studies, writing center practice and research, and the teaching of academic writing have developed not only into a trans-disciplinary but also a transnational endeavor. People and ideas, books and concepts within our field have been traveling back and forth across countries and continents. Sometimes the resulting connections, traditions, influences might be implicit but often scholars and practitioners are well aware of who or what has shaped one's own work in our shared field.

For the German-based JoSch: Journal of Writing Studies (vol. 25) we are primarily looking for collaborative contributions from diverse teams of authors centering their experiences with each other's work. We invite these teams to explore the back and forth of writing concepts, theory, and practice across national, institutional, and disciplinary borders. Submissions by single authors are nonetheless possible.

We suggest considering questions such as:

- What did you learn from your co-author(s), from their discipline, line of research, cultural background, etc. that influences your work in writing studies?
- How did your own thinking benefit from a specific example of collaboration or community work in writing studies (i. e. work in a community of practice, Wenger 2008)?
- Which travelling concepts (i. e. Mieke Bal 2002, Neumann & Nünning 2012) have been especially important for your work and perspectives on writing? What impact did they have? (e.g., what were their "travel routes"?) How where they transformed in the process?
- Which concepts from „non-English“ writing research should ‚travel‘ more intensively on an international level?
- Where are the regional blind spots in the traveling of ideas and concepts?
- What could be done to foster international exchange?

Submissions should be in English and between 10,000 - 22,000 characters (incl. spaces).

Submission deadline: November 1st, 2022
